Punishment in schools has constantly been a matter of concern. Maybe this is the reason it is generally overlooked. However, while communicating with parents as well as students, the schools can't try to ignore this. At times, punishments are important to enforce discipline, however, the awareness drives it to turn out to be physically abusive. For this very reason, when you approach the Sharjah Indian School, you will actually get a discipline clause stated among all the positives.

So, let's find out the matter of punishments here. Basically, students have to keep up a certain level of discipline to maintain the school's decorum. While the disobedience crosses a specific limit, a strict hand is frequently needed to get the students back within the acknowledged discipline zone.

What is wrong with the conventional methods?

When you envisage punishments in school, some of the traditional methods immediately come to mind.

- The student is given the punishment to go out of the class and stand in the hallway.
- Detain all the students after school to write lines.
- Suspend the student for a few days.
- Or expelling for serious misbehaviours.

While these ways are still working in many schools, there is additionally the matter where a lot of something loses its planned value. If a student is asked to go out of the classroom and stand for each trivial mistake he/she makes, this punishment will no more put any impact on the child. Again, this does not imply that the next step must be a suspension. This will lead to the scenario where the student will turn into the self-loathing type and begin blaming oneself while the actual devil was hidden in his conduct.

Then, what must schools do?

Setting up the traditional norms of punishment as useless may appear like disarming the schools entirely in implementing discipline.

Detain students, but sit with them afterwards

If a kid is crossing limits to disrupt the class by showing tantrums, detaining is the only option left. He may be asked to write lines continually but things cannot end there. Schools should have counselors who can sit and talk to the child to know the main issue and assist the student face it.

If suspension is required, set corrective homework

A suspended student should not stay home spending more of his time playing video games. Then getting suspended doesn't serve its purpose. The schools here should include the parents and establish corrective work for the child relying on the mistake that results in such consequence.

Teachers must be trained to stop it in class

Not just misbehaviour has to reach to suspension or detention. At school, the teachers must be capable to handle the situation at its origin and stop the pointless explosion. They can communicate with the misbehaving kid, have one-to-one sessions, move them to the right path and provide a minor disciplinary check if required.

Confronting the significance is necessary Students should be enabled to experience the actions of their mistakes because then also punishments have their huge impact. At Sharjah International School, students every time have the best suitable training, be it personal or academic. Punishment is not just a topic to be overlooked, yet to be acknowledged and improved.

School provides quality education, identifies and nurtures the uniqueness of each child by tapping their hidden unique potential and grooming them to their very best.
